AUTHOR(S):	Mara Berde
SUMMARY:	Every Jewish camp talks about community, but are we making sure that every person in camp is not only welcomed, but embraced for who they are? 0:00 – 0:10 Personal Story and introductions (10 min)

Welcome participants and share who I am and what is my personal connection to this topic. Tell story of when I was a counselor and a camper in my cabin went home early because she didn't feel truly welcomed or comfortable being her true self at camp.

Have each participant share their name, preferred gender pronoun, camp, and why they signed up for this session / why it is a compelling topic. (In most sessions I wouldn't spend as much time getting to know the group, but because this is a more personal topic, it's important that participants get to know each other and that we know who is in the room.)

Explain goals of this session and what we'll be covering:

- Camp and self assessment using start/stop/continue model
- What's preventing us from responding (Ambush activity)

0:10 – 0:30 Camp and Self Assessment using Start/Stop/Continue (20 min)

Introduce start/stop/continue as a way of assessing our camps and ourselves. The point is to highlight things that we are already doing well (continue), notice areas where we could improve (start), and stop doing things that may inhibit positive progress towards a truly inclusive community (stop). Explain that we will be using these throughout the rest of this elective, so participants should be thorough and thoughtful.

Pass out start/stop/continue chart along with Making Mesches periodic table. Explain that each of these things can be rooted in Jewish values and using the periodic table, assign a middah or two to each box on the chart.

This part (filling out the chart) can be done alone or in pairs. After a few minutes of filling out the chart, have participants get with a partner and share. (We will revisit these later, so this is more about sharing and gathering ideas than solving anything.)

00:30 – 00:45 Ambush Exercise (15 min)

Explain:

In the previous exercise, we looked at things we would like to start doing or stop doing. At camp and in life, it can be difficult to initiate something or stop something. This next exercise will help us uncover some of the personal barriers to responding or taking action. It will allow us to hit "pause" when we encounter a situation that requires that we make a quick decision.

Our decision to speak or not to speak, and what to say, will have implications; this can be a stressful moment, so here'll we'll "pause" it and gain some tools for how to determine the best course of action. It will help us to think logically and not respond from a place of emotion, so that we can create the best possible response and the best opportunity for education.

Activity Instructions:

- Define the word "Ambush" (barrage, overwhelmed, attacked, bombarded)
- In these moments, you might feel "ambushed" with reasons for not responding (or for being reluctant to respond.) Let's get these out in the open in order to acknowledge them and know how to deal with them in the next activity.

- Have everyone stand in a circle. Ask for one volunteer to stand in the center (this person has the easiest job, they simply stand there and represent everyone.) Everyone around them is like their brain, firing ideas about why not to respond.
- Present a very short and simply scenario and explain that we just hit PAUSE on that situation. Now, as the counselor, what are you thinking? Why are you hesitant to respond?
 - Examples: A counselor walks past and hears 2 campers saying: “that’s so gay; you’re such a fag...” Or witnessing an interaction between 2 counselors. Or when you realize a policy or program isn’t aligned with camp’s values of inclusion.
- People in the circle are going to cross the circle (walking past the “every counselor”) while saying “I am reluctant to respond because...”
- Anyone in the circle can cross the circle while answering this question; it’s okay if things are repeated. If there is a lull,
- If 2 facilitators, have 1 write while the other participates. If 1 facilitator, try do capture the answers on a flipchart/paper while also (if needed) prompting them with new reasons for being reluctant to respond.
- After a few minutes, stop and debrief.

Debrief Questions:

- How did it make the person in the middle feel?
- How did it feel to say these things aloud?
- Why did we do this? (To understand why we let those moments pass us by; why do we hesitate?)
- Were there any responses that surprised you?

Wrap Up / Transition

Ambush activity was about recognizing personal barriers. There are other barriers to making change at camp, especially on an institutional level. Now that we have a sense of the barriers that exist, we can begin the hard work of change making, both inside ourselves as well as externally at camp.

00:45 – 00:55 Culture Change 101 (10 min)

Change is hard. There are many barriers to creating positive culture change in our camps. Ask participants if they have experience creating or witnessing culture change in camp.

Brief discussion about how culture change happens. It may be slow, and requires a lot of patience. (The pace of camp is interesting though; once you’ve done something for 2 summers people will think that’s the way “it’s always been done.”) Mention community organizing principles and power analysis. Recognizing who has influence and the relationships they have. Focus on what you can tangibly actually do.

00:55 – 01:15 Taking Action (20 min)

Explain that we will use the rest of our time together to dive deeper into making change. Look back at your Start/Stop/Continue charts and feel free to add anything that may have come up since you first filled it out. Using these charts, we are going to get into small groups of 4 people and help each other come up with mini action plans for how to make changes in camp.

Break up into groups and give everyone 20 minutes to work on each person’s topic/program of their choosing (5 minutes per person x 4 people.)

01:15 – 01:30 Closing Circle (15 min)

Come back together as a whole group. Have each person go around and share their takeaways, both personal and for their camp. Allow participants time to exchange contact information so the conversations can continue. Mention affinity group and Keshet meet-up at breakfast.

ADDITIONAL NOTES FOR BRINGING IT BACK TO CAMP:

The purpose of this program is for personal learning and growth, both for the individual participant as well as how they can become change agents in their camps. The goal isn't so that participants can run or replicate this program at their camps, though it could modified to be run during staff training.
